Passing of the Outhouse
By Melvin Van Domealen
Mountaindale, OR
When someone reaches the age group that I am now in, the 80 year olds, we realize we are the last of a vanishing group.

These folks have lived through the great depressions and experienced the one room school. We survived without all of today’s technology and were familiar with the outhouse. Or, as we reminisce at our senior center, we are indeed, the outhouse generation.

When I was a child almost every home site still had an outhouse somewhere. Now they are almost a thing of the past.

My parents’ home at Mountaindale was what was called a “Craftsman Bungalow”, and now, over 100 years old. This house always had indoor facilities. But, a matching craftsman bungalow outhouse stood out across the garden spot, still quite useable. The distinguishing feature of this outhouse was the star vent in the peak of the roof.

We have all seen the familiar crescent moon vents, the diamond and square vents. But a star, a star was real class. I’ve never seen another.

Once, while one of my older brothers was occupying our outhouse, that star presented a challenge to me. On about the fourth attempt I was able to chuck a dry dirt clod right through the star. Now, you can imagine this had the effect of a hand grenade going off inside a tank. That brother would have tanned me good but I was saved by hiding out in a nearby sweet corn patch.

These brothers developed a way to warm the seat if the days were cold. They would touch a match to a handful of newspapers and throw it down the hole. My Father soon put a stop to that maneuver.

The back wall of our outhouse was blackened from a candle holder installed there, melted wax splattered the seat. The joke about the Montgomery Ward catalog being ever present was all too true. The index pages usually disappeared first.

My Father told me about a building in Banks that had a dance area on its second floor. He said there was also a boardwalk that connected to a second story outhouse. I would have loved to seen that.

John Crocker had the W.P.A. (Work Project Administration) outhouse that was installed at his parents’ farm in the late 1930’s. This was a “make work” project brought in by the great depression. A couple of men would show up and dig a hole lined with plywood. Several days later a pre-formed concrete base was laid. Later on an assembled outhouse was set on that base. Almost like an assembly line.

John said there was a clever pulley and cord system that lowered the lid covering the seat when the outhouse door was closed. We had a W.P.A. outhouse behind our barn, but Crocker’s must have had the deluxe model because ours didn’t have the lid-closing system.

Mountaindale School had a pair of W.P.A. outhouses and they were in use until the mid-1950’s. Our neighbors to the east had a 3-holer outhouse. This had a split level seat with the children’s place on the lower level. I always admired this one. It was a thing of beauty, the only one around.

Back again in the late 1930’s there were five families in the neighborhood that had children in high school. One of these boys had a stripped down Model “T” Ford with just a flatbed on back. They could pile enough kids on that Ford to lift it up and turn it around whenever they wanted to change direction.

One Halloween this group zeroed in on two families that lived just across the road from each other. This was in the area of the community hall or as some called it, the “Hooligan Hall” about 2.5 miles north of the Mountaindale store.

Instead of just pushing over these outhouses, a common practice, this gang switched them at night. When the folks woke in the morning they had the neighbor’s outhouse in working order. I don’t believe they were ever returned to the original locations. I was too young for this event.

I still have our Craftsman outhouse. It was moved over into our woods when we built our home in 1961. The shake roof has been replaced twice over the years. No longer operational, only used for storage. Whenever I go by and look at that star, I think of that dirt clod and it brings a smile – memories.
